This exhibition continues the series dedicated to the in-depth analysis of works included in the permanent collection of the Museo Picasso Málaga as a contribution to extending awareness of aspects of the artist's great aesthetic diversity. Dream and Lie of Franco is the starting point for Cartoons on the Front Line, which shows both the original copper plates, and also two sets of sketches belonging to different print runs: two etchings on China paper glued to Japan paper (signed and numbered 1 to 150), and two etchings on Montval laid paper (the signature stamped in grey ink, and numbered 1 to 850). The two engravings were finally published on Picasso's initiative, together with a text written by himself, all presented in a portfolio with a facsimile of the handwritten title glued to the cover. All proceeds from the sale of copies went to support the Republican cause.

Pablo Picasso began work on the plates on 8th January 1937. His illustrations are images against the military uprising of July 1936. Each plate contains nine vignettes arranged in a manner reminiscent of satirical cartoons and comic strips, where the artist caricatured questions such as violence, the destruction of art, the consequences of totalitarianism, confrontation, and the drama of the innocent, in a language combining the avant-garde and the popular as a means of denouncing the barbarity of war.

The plates were concluded in June 1937, and between the first vignettes and the last, satire and parody shifted towards a representation of the harshness of the drama of war. This was made particularly clear in the figure of the mother with the dead child, where the viewer recognises the iconography of one of Picasso's great masterpieces, Guernica, which he had begun in May that same year to be shown at the pavilion of the Spanish Republic in the Paris International Exhibition. This central piece of the pavilion was shown together with almost 120 other works and documents by both Pablo Picasso and other artists who, like the artist from Malaga and faced with the tragedy of the conflict, shared graphic and visual processes in their search for emotional impact.

This then is an attempt to make a detailed iconographic analysis based on the comparison of images. As a whole it allows us to approach the intense plastic activity carried out on both sides during the Spanish War, in particular using techniques associated with the graphic arts. In these works, the artists displayed their talent in the service of a cause, often making use of avant-garde forms and techniques, such as post-cubism, futurism, expressionism or surrealism. Thanks to the development of the mass media, this collective that the poet Mayakovski called the "Army of Art" definitively transformed propaganda language and satire in Spain. An example are the drawings of Toño Salazar, from El Salvador, John Heartfield's photomontages, the graphic compositions of Josep Renau and Mauricio Amster, the caricatures of Luis Bagaría and George Grosz, or the photographs of Agustí Centelles. The exhibition also shows some engravings from the Disasters of War series by Goya, reprinted by the Republican government in 1937.

This exhibition has been curated by Inocente Soto Calzado, Salvador Haro González, and Claustre Rafart I Planas, with the collaboration of Carlos Pérez as scientific advisor.

This exhibition has been devised by the Museu Picasso de Barcelona and co-produced by the Museu Picasso de Barcelona and the Museo Picasso Málaga.
